

Statutory other measures: April 2025

Most countries include some provision to take leave in the case of the illness of a child. There are a few exceptions, e.g. China, Mexico, Turkey, Uruguay. In Malta, the right is limited to the public sector, and not available for private sector employees. For European Union member states, the Work-life Balance Directive gives all workers an entitlement to 'time off from work on grounds of force majeure for urgent family reasons in cases of sickness or accident making their immediate presence indispensable,' yet without specifying minimum requirements for length of time or payment. In some cases, leave is allocated in the number of days in total in a given year; in others, it is allocated in terms of number of days per illness. Leave is often paid and often at a high level of income replacement, usually without an upper limit. In some cases, the length of leave entitlement decreases as children get older. Along with length, payment varies considerably.

Many countries also offer additional leave entitlements to care for their family members, in some cases for public sector employees only (e.g., Brazil). Conditions for taking leave vary, from countries where leave is available in the case of ordinary illness, through to countries where it is confined to the serious or terminal illness or care of a very dependent relative. There may be further provisions to care for dependants with disabilities (for these, please consult the country notes). Length, payment, and other dimensions of leave also vary considerably.

Legislation which entitles parents to reduce working hours specifically during their child's early months is fairly common across the countries in the review. In some cases, usually focused on the period shortly after childbirth, this is intended to facilitate the (breast-)feeding of the child by the mother; but in several cases, this reduction has evolved into a general right that can be taken for any reason and/or by the father (e.g., Japan, Portugal, Slovenia, and Spain). Parents who are allowed to reduce their working hours in this way are usually entitled to earnings compensation. In Spain, reduced daily hours can be consolidated into full-time leave, thus, in practice, extending Maternity leave by between 2 to 4 weeks. In other cases, parents have the right to reduce working hours, extending beyond the early months after childbirth, and intended to support combining care and (part-time) employment (e.g., in Austria, Germany, Croatia, Finland).

Finally, in a growing number of countries – which is also stipulated by the EU Work-Life Balance Directive – the parents have a legal right to request flexible working (often in a specific form) from their employers. Typically, employers must consider their request and may only refuse it if there is a clear business case for doing so. In Bulgaria, mothers of children under the age of six have – in principle – the right to work from home. We may expect rights to work (partially) from home to be further expanded, in particular in the aftermath of the COVID-19 pandemic and growing attention given to flexible working arrangements. In some countries (e.g. Iceland), employers are required to make the necessary arrangements to enable employees to balance family life and work, including the arrangement of work in a flexible manner.

⁴ Although there is this statutory right of remote working for mothers with children under the age of 6 years, in practice this is non-applicable. This is because employers in the private sector refuse flexible or remote working, based on the argument that private sector jobs require strict working hours and physical presence. This affects the majority of young Bulgarian women who primarily work in this sector. See additional comments in the Bulgarian country note.
